Real beauty is internal, the only kind that will not perish, the kind you can not take away, and can only be seen when looking into the eyes of the soul. It is that which cannot be measured, for true beauty is an attitude. We are all concerned about appearances and try not to appear quirky or clash with the conventions that imprison us and do not allow us to show the world our splendor.

Inner beauty is, in plain terms, the beauty we have inside. This has nothing to do with our physical appearance. It does not matter what your complexion is, what your hair is like or how much makeup you wear. On the contrary, it has nothing to do with looks. Inner beauty is a combo of your characteristics, originality and moral compass.

"Beauty is on the inside" is one of those mammoth lies we're hardwired to teach children, like "You can be anything you want" and "No, you can't, but you wouldn't like it anyway." Goodness may...

Horrifically subverted in a children's book, in which a young monster who accidentally made a "pretty face" (which was considered horrifyingly ugly by the family) and got stuck with it took her mother's advice "true beauty is on the inside" to the literal extreme and flipped her face inside out.
