Generally, you will want to head to a predetermined bug out location. Hopefully you have already thought about, and even prepared, your bug out location for use in a disaster situation. This should be a safe location away from dense population centers. It should offer you plenty of natural resources and a sense of security.

6. Easier to Prepare. As mentioned above, when you bug-out you must carry as little supplies as possible and try to discretely stock your planned safety den before the disaster. If your plan is to bug-in, you should be able to stock your home to the brim with any and all items you might need to survive.

The Bug-In plan is a solid preparation tool for the worst scenarios you could conceive. It involves plenty of forethought, supplies, and staying informed. Bugging-in is not a reaction to an event, but it is the result of months or even years of preparation. It is very different from bugging out, although both plans are deeply rooted in prepping.

Depending on your location and anticipated threats, your highest priority may be different. If your Bug Out Location (BOL) is a long ways away, weight distribution is almost surely your #1 priority. Urban areas may require resource accessibility or a gray man appearance to be the highest priority. You can even anticipate changing priorities.
